But before we go any further, it's important to address the terminology of what we have here; the title 'Hollywood Pop Brass' doesn't give us the whole picture. It's not what you might call a conventional brass library, in the orchestral sense. It's more akin to what many people refer to as a horn section. Within the pop world, we are firmly considering horn and brass sections used by inspirational artists such as Michael Jackson and Earth, Wind & Fire, who further inspired the use of horn sections for later artists such as Jamiroquai, Amy Winehouse and Bruno Mars. But this library also extends into the world of Latin, jazz and even 80s pop.

Studio thriller

It's fitting, then, that the library has been recorded at the EastWest Studio complex; Studio 1 is reputed to have one of the best brass-section recording rooms in the world, at least according to legendary engineer Bruce Swedien – and he should know, having recorded the horns for, amongst others, Michael Jackson.

Importantly, the section construct varies according to musical style and setting, between a four-piece section consisting of two trumpets, sax and trombone, or a five-piece section which employs an additional sax. The saxes alter from one patch to the next, with use of alto, tenor and baritone saxes. Once the lower baritone sax comes into play, the reference to what many regard as the original legends, Tower Of Power, comes into focus, as there is a breadth in the section which is synonymous with their musical arrangements. However, the smaller four-piece section is more akin to the unified voicings attributed to bands such as Earth, Wind & Fire.

There is a great familiarity as I start to examine the patch list; anyone who has used EastWest products before will be familiar with the layout of the reliably excellent PLAY 6 playback engine, with eight categories offering a mixture of articulations and full-on played phrases. The sustained and short articulations are assured and varied in technical specification, with options for everything from straight sustains to crescendos in varying length.
